"We're starting to come down on more employees leaving that we're paying for and that's really not fair or right," said David Karpinski, who helped design Postmates' payment system over the last four years before he was removed, according to LinkedIn. "People are paying on time. That's very important." He says some former Postmebers, who were laid off, say their claims of underpayments are often turned in but they haven't been paid.. That's Facebook's goal with the $13 billion acquisition of Seattle-based Postmates , which the social network says could lead to millions of new employees making up its workforce. But the business has had some hiccups in trying to meet some of that goal and some employees are leaving the company, as they've complained about low pay, unpaid holiday pay and a lack of benefits.
